Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Find Access Numbers

Find access numbers by State or by Area Code & Exchange

By State

By Area Code & Exchange

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.

Long Distance Charges

Make sure the access numbers are local to your calling area since you will be responsible for all long distance charges. You may verify the number with your local phone company.

Finding the Best Exchange for You

When you access SBC Yahoo!, your modem is actually placing a telephone call. Since you are responsible for all telephone costs associated with your household's use of SBC Yahoo!, make sure you're using the number that's best for you. With certain calling plans, distance is not the sole criterion in determining cost. When in doubt, check with your local telephone company to determine which SBC Yahoo! access number to use.

Many of our new access numbers are in new exchanges (if you are calling the number 914-555-1212, "555" is the exchange). These new exchanges are frequently not yet listed in phone books. When you call your phone company, make sure you ask them whether the town or city where our access number is located is a local call for you ("Can I call Yonkers, New York as a local call?"). Simply asking if the specific area code and exchange of the access number is a local call ("Can I call 914-555-xxxx as a local call?") may not provide you with the information you need.

If your local phone company doesn't recognize the exchange for one of our access numbers, please let us know at our Report a Network Problem. The two options are "Local telephone company advised number is not local," and "Local telephone company does not recognize number at all." We are compiling this information and working to find the best solutions we can for you on a market-by-market basis.
